

A Trip to Italy

In Italy, I saw that there was an amazing understanding of art and a much different culture. Their meals, their streets, the people, all of them impressed me a lot. I tasted Italy's famous pasta and pizza in a restaurant in a small place called Giulianova. I saw astounding, aesthetic historical artifacts, sculptures, and unforgettable views in Vatican. The kindness and hospitality of the people took me aback. The Italians being quite knowledgeable about their own history and sharing it with us was very affective to me. The respect they had to religious values, as well as their own religion, was great. I visited a few churches. The way they attribute one meaning to their artworks, and give place to art and other staples in a place intended for worship left me quite pleased. I was very curious about the histories of the artifacts that have been built. Italy is a whole new world. We went to a large university. They made us do biology-related experiments. Before that, we went to a high school full of life, with amazing people, and full of--again--wonderful art, called Marie Curie. We did various activities here; we danced, ate great food everyday, sang, did robotics activites, and played the different marches of our countries. At the nights, we played in parks, and were invited to many houses for food.
